

To the Reader

Please be completely frank. Your report is solely for the guidance of the editors of the Press and for its Publications Committee, and your name will not be revealed to the author without your express permission.

We shall be grateful if in the course of your comments you answer each of these questions in reasonable detail:

What has the author accomplished? (A brief summary in your own words of the content and argument of the manuscript will be helpful.)

What are the chief books on the subject, and how do they compare with this manuscript? (We would like as detailed a comparative bibliography as you can conveniently provide.)

Is the work original? Of sound scholarship?

Is the work important? Would you buy it as a published book?

Is the style clear and readable? Does it contain repetitious material? Is it the right length for its content and purpose?

Do you recommend publication by the Press?

How can the manuscript be improved?

Thank you for agreeing to give us your advice. Please let us know what you have to spend for postage.
